

What happens to the material you bring to your recycling centre?

Glass Bottles and Jars are transformed in Ireland into a cullet that is sold to glass manufacturers as a raw material.

Plastics, paper and cardboard are baled and sold to waste brokers on international markets (various destinations depending on market condition)

Fridges are sent to the UK where they are dismantled in a specialist factory that removes the hazardous gases from the fridges. The metal and plastic then go for recycling.

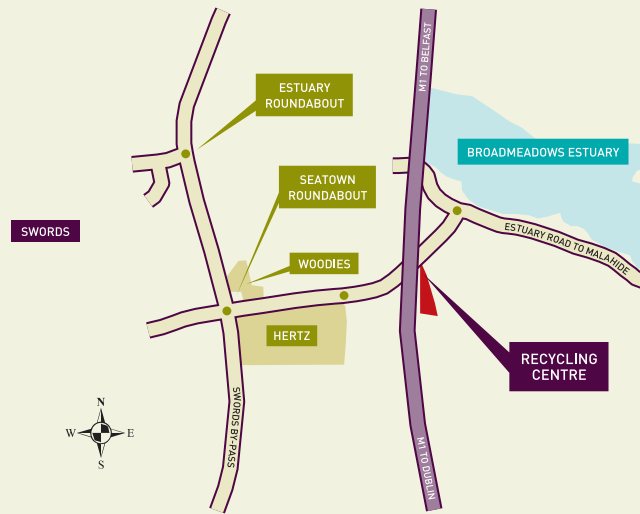

Green waste is brought to a facility in Kilcock (operated by Enrich Environmental) where it is turned into compost.

Paint is sent to various facilities in Europe where the paint goes for recovery. For example in one such facility it is mixed to sawdust and then used as a fuel in industrial processes.

Bulky waste goes through a shredder that breaks the various elements in the bulky waste. This shredded material then goes through a series of screens and sorting mechanisms where the fractions that can be recycled are removed (wood, metal, aluminium, etc.). The other fraction is shredded further and turned into Refuse Derived Fuel – a combustible material used in cement kilns. A small portion cannot be used and goes to landfill (this was 16% in August 2010).
